WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

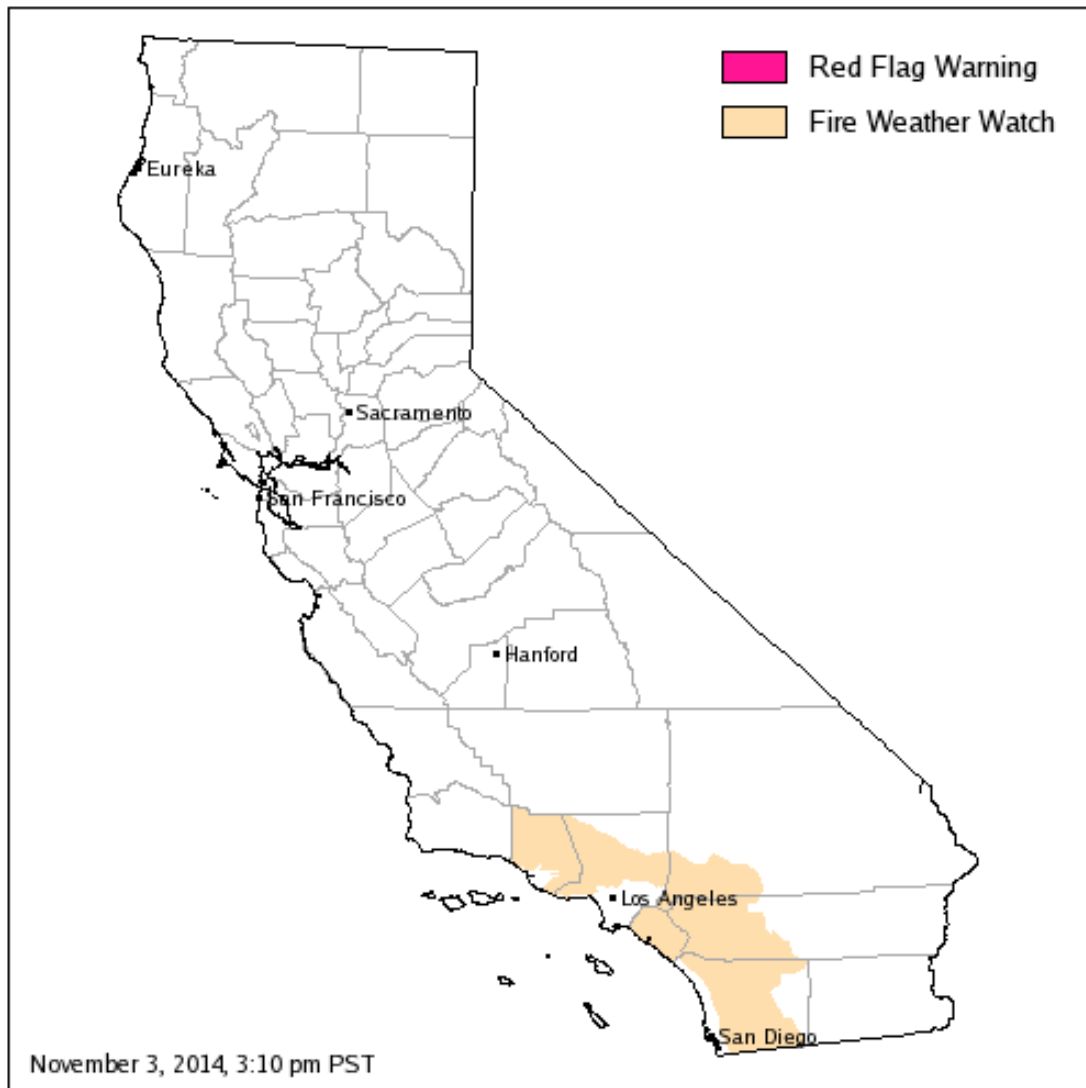

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA:

A strong high pressure area over the eastern Pacific will remain stationary for the next week or so. A ridge from the high is currently extending out over the Northern Operations area while a frontal system is moving through the Pacific Northwest. As the ridge moves southward tonight and Tuesday scattered light rain will move into far Northern California. The remainder of the region will be partly to mostly cloudy. Another ridge off the main high will move over the Northern Operations area Wednesday, and another frontal system will reach far Northwest California with light rain Thursday and Thursday night. A much stronger ridge will build in Friday through Sunday with moderate north-northeast/offshore winds.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA:

Surface high pressure over the Great Basin will bring local northeast to east winds of 10 to 20 mph with gusts to 35 mph across the mountains and below the canyons and passes of Southern California through Tuesday afternoon. The surface high will strengthen some Tuesday night through Wednesday morning causing offshore winds to become a little more widespread and increase to 15 to 25 mph with gusts to 40 mph. Offshore winds will decrease a little Wednesday afternoon through Thursday morning and will become light Thursday afternoon through this weekend. Across Central California, winds will be light through this weekend. Strong high pressure aloft will bring a significant warming trend to the region through Thursday. Maximum temperatures will be in the 50s across the mountains and 70s in the valleys today. On Thursday, the warmest day, temperatures in the mountains will warm into the 70s with valleys in the 80s to low 90s. A slow cooling trend will occur Friday through this weekend as the ridge starts to weaken. Minimum humidity will be in the single digits and teens away from the Central Valley and coastal areas through this weekend.
